Flood Activity California

- Terrified homeowners had to wade through waist-deep water to escape their home in San Diego after record rains brought flash flooding across the city on Monday.
- It was the third of three Pacific storms to strike the West Coast since Friday, with the first bypassing the region and the second producing only about one-third of an inch of relatively warm rain.
- Firefighters and lifeguards performed 24 high water rescues from the San Diego and Tijuana Rivers alone in San Diego County. The San Diego Fire Department said crews rescued hundreds of others from flooded homes.
- A high school in the city was being used as a temporary shelter after about 100 homes were in some way affected by the flooding, according to Mayor Todd Gloria, who declared a state of emergency "due to extreme rainfall and flash flooding."
- The NWS said 2 to 3 inches of rain fell over the San Diego area, including a January-record 2.73 inches at San Diego's airport – its 4th-wettest day on record.
- The water level on the San Diego River was still rising in the afternoon, trapping some office workers. San Diego usually sees only 1.98 inches of rain for the entire month of January, the second-wettest month.
- The next storm hits California on Wednesday, but major storms look to stay north of San Diego.
