Tropical Activity

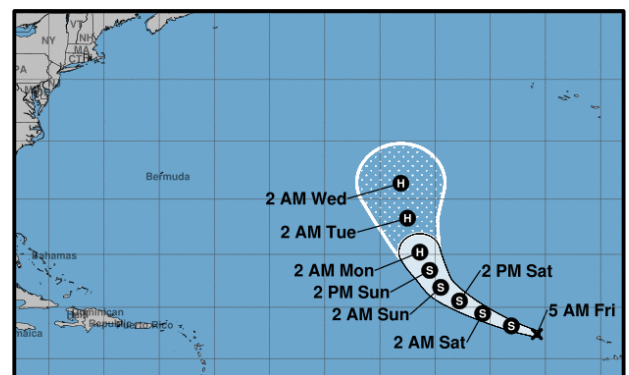

Atlantic – Hurricane Lee (CAT 5)

- Hurricane Lee has undergone a rapid intensification, reaching Category 5 strength and packing 165-mph winds as of Friday morning. Just 24 hours prior, it had been an 80-mph Category 1 hurricane.
- Lee, which was named in the central Atlantic on Tuesday, was located about 630 miles east of the Leeward Islands of the eastern Caribbean early Friday morning.
- AccuWeather meteorologists say that Lee will generally take a west-northwestward path over the Atlantic through this weekend.
- At this time, the storm is likely to pass far enough away from Puerto Rico and the northern Leeward Islands to avoid severe conditions. However, Lee's path will still be close enough to the islands that some rain and wind impacts will spread across Anguilla, Antigua and Barbuda as well as the British and U.S. Virgin Islands this weekend.
- AccuWeather forecasters say that there is a possibility for the powerful hurricane to impact North America, including the northeastern U.S. and Atlantic Canada.
- As the storm nears the Eastern Seaboard next week, the beaches will face building surf and seas, as well as a significant risk for dangerous rip currents.
- AccuWeather forecasters are monitoring Lee closely and say that there are still several future track scenarios from the middle of next week through next weekend.
- The timing of when Lee takes a turn to the north will be the main factor in determining the exact impacts along the East Coast.

Atlantic – Tropical Storm Margo

- Located 460 miles WNW of Cabo Verde Islands.
- Maximum sustained winds 40 mph, moving WNW at 16 mph.
- Gradual strengthening is expected during the next few days; forecast to become a hurricane over the weekend.
