Severe Weather Outlook Southern U.S.

- A powerful cross-country storm is expected to bring heavy rain, as well as the threat of flooding and severe weather, which could complicate weekend plans for millions across parts of Texas and the South.
- According to the FOX Forecast Center, the sprawling system will move into and out of the Southwest on Saturday.
- As the storm system moves across the Deep South and onto the Southeast coast through Presidents' Day, a widespread 1–2 inches of rain is expected.
- Localized pockets of 2–3 inches of rain are possible across parts of Oklahoma, Arkansas, Missouri, Mississippi, Alabama and Georgia through the holiday weekend.
- Places like Atlanta and Jackson, Mississippi are sitting between five and six inches below average rainfall.
- The system will bring a low-level flash flood threat from Lubbock, Texas through Joplin, Missouri on Friday.
- Severe thunderstorms are possible Friday afternoon from West Texas north through central Oklahoma.
- The risk of severe weather, including the possibility of tornadoes, will shift east across the Gulf Coast through the weekend.
- On Saturday, thunderstorms could develop along a line and sweep through the major Texas metros of Dallas, Houston and San Antonio in the afternoon.
