Flood Risk

Hawaii

- The third storm in less than a month is bringing more downpours to Hawaii, with rainfall expected to renew dangerous flooding and mudslides into next week.
- Downpours since Tuesday have already brought an inch or more of rain to Honolulu and up to a foot of rain across the southern parts of the Big Island.
- Rounds of drenching downpours and gusty thunderstorms will continue into Friday night, local time.
- "The most concentrated rainfall is likely from Thursday night to Friday evening, when excessive rainfall rates will be most common," AccuWeather Senior Meteorologist Brett Anderson said. In some cases, rainfall may exceed an inch per hour on south- and west-facing mountain slopes.
- High water is likely on poorly drained city streets. In hilly terrain, some roads may turn into fast-moving streams. Reservoirs may fill to capacity and overflow, increasing the risk of levee issues.
- "A lull in the downpours is possible on Saturday, but additional showers and thunderstorms are likely into early next week as a front associated with the Kona storm stalls over the region," Anderson said.
- Gusty winds from the stormy pattern will stir heavy surf along the shorelines of the islands that rarely experience large waves.
- Flood watches as a result of excessive rainfall will remain in effect for all Hawaiian islands through tomorrow afternoon.
